When the door of happiness closes, another opens. But often, we look so long at the closed door; we don't see the one that has opened for us.

-Helen Keller

WASHINGTON, April 8, 2013 – As the Annual World Bank Conference on Land and Poverty convened this week in Washington, DC, The World Bank Group issued the following statement:

By 2050, the world will have two billion more people to feed. To do that, global agricultural production will need to increase by 70 percent. That calls for substantial new investment in agriculture-- in smallholders and large farms—from both the public and private sectors.

But investment alone will not be enough. High and volatile food and fuel prices and the effects of climate change and scarce resources make the challenge even more daunting. Unless crop yields can be raised, many people will remain hungry, undernourished, and unable to seize opportunities to improve their lives.

In addition to food, there will be an increased demand for shelter and housing. Without proper planning, we are not going to be in the position to meet this demand. It can be argued that in Kenya, we already cannot meet the demand.
